Jack Frost's Chimes

JOHNNY BEAR walked out of the forest theatre feeling very low. There was to be a big show complete with entertainment and music and he, Johnny, wouldn't be able to take part because he had no particular talent. Corny Caterpillar was inching along beside his cumbersome friend, being careful to stay away from Johnny's big feet.

"Gosh, Johnny, I'm sorry you won't be in the show."

"I'm the one who's sorry, Corny," Johnny sniffed. "I know I can't dance the way you can, nor sing like Jenny Nightingale, but if I had an instrument, I could play in the orchestra."

"Let's find you an instrument then," Corny said.

The two walked along and suddenly Corny saw a violin sticking out of some bushes. "Oh," he cried, "the very thing." He started to pick the violin up when Lippity Cricket poked his head out of the bushes and shouted. "Just a minute! That's mine, Corny Caterpillar, and even if I wanted to lend you my violin, I couldn't. Violins are attached to crickets, as anyone with any sense knows."

"I know too!" Corny cried. "It's just that I wanted a musical instrument for my friend Johnny."

And Johnny and Corny walked away. Just above the bear's cave there was a woodland pool and the friends sat down here to listen to a frog quartet busily rehearsing. They listened until the sun went down and the night turned cold.

"It's awfully early in the season," Johnny remarked as he lumbered to his feet, "but isn't it chilly?"

"Brrrrr, that it is," Corny shivered. "Smells like snow. Well, good night, Johnny, and cheer up. Maybe we'll be able to find an instrument for you in the morning."

"Thanks, Corny, but I expect it's no use." And the bear walked sadly to his cave which was a few feet down the hill.

As Corny watched his friend enter the cave an idea suddenly came to him. "Hmm. the pool—the cold air—well, well." And he started to grin as he got busy. With the help of the bullfrogs Corny began pouring water downhill. The water dripped off the ledge for some time, then, satisfied with his handiwork, he hurried to his own home for the night.

But bright and early next morning he raced to Johnny's house and called, "Hurry out, Sleepyhead, I've got an instrument for you to play."

Never did a bear get out of a cave faster than Johnny. When he got outdoors what should appear to his wondering eyes but a set of chimes hanging from the ledge. They weren't ordinary chimes made of tubes of metal, oh, no, they were made of icicles of all thicknesses and lengths and when Corny gave Johnny a stick and when Johnny struck the stick against the icicles they rang out more tunefully than any chimes you've heard before or since.

Johnny hurried to the forest theatre with Corny right behind him and the bear was immediately allowed to play in the orchestra. Everyone who heard him said he was the hit of the show.

"You're the real hit, Corny," Johnny said to his friend after the show. "You made a hit with me giving me that fine instrument to play on."

"Thanks, Johnny, but it really wasn't my doing. If Jack Frost hadn't been around to freeze the water you wouldn't have had the chimes at all. You really ought to thank him."

"If I ever see him," Johnny laughed, "I certainly will."

MY DREAM

BETSY snuggled down deeper into her feather bed. She pulled the covers up close around her ears. But still she couldn't shut out that sound.

"Wooo! Let me in! Let me in! Wooo, wooo!".

The windows rattled. Bang, bang! shook the shutters outside.

Betsy sat up and pulled on her robe and slippers. Well, why not let the wind in? She was lonely, anyway. And unhappy, too. Betsy, you see, had been sent to bed early because she lost that letter Brother Bill sent from overseas.

Mother always liked to read Bill's letters over and over again. Betsy knew this very well. She should have been more careful with this letter when Mother let her have it to look at the funny pictures Brother Bill had drawn in for her.

Betsy was sitting in the porch swing at the time, looking at her comic books. All at once a gust of wind whirled around the corner. It picked up the comic books and sent them flying. Worse still, it fairly grabbed the letter right out of Betsy's hand!

Betsy gathered up the scattered comics. But she couldn't find the letter anywhere. You can hardly blame Betsy for being very provoked with the wind. It was really the wind's fault that she was sent to bed so early.

But now Betsy felt better. She heard the wind shivering outside in the cold. She felt sorry for it.

"Wooo! wooo! Please let me in!"

"All right, I'm coming," Betsy replied, opening the shutters wide.

Wheee! The wind leapt across the room like a witch on her broomstick. Once more comic books flew everywhere. Betsy heard their pages flutter, even in the dark.

"Oh, do be careful!" Betsy scolded. "That's very ungrateful of you. I let you in out of the cold and you muss up my room. That's how you lost Brother Bill's letter. That's why I was sent to bed."

"I lost it?" huffed the wind. "Indeed, you were the careless one! But I shan't scold. You were very thoughtful to let me in. You have no idea how hard it is to get indoors nowadays, with storm-doors and weather-stripping everywhere!"

"That's because you chill people, and blow things away," Betsy pointed out.

"Poof!" scoffed the wind. "Who makes hearth-fires burn brighter? Who turns the windmills? Who dries wet clothes on the clotheslines?"

Betsy hadn't thought of that. She sat on the edge of her bed and shivered a little.

"I can't stay long," whistled the wind. It whisked the curtains into a lovely tangle and added, "But this is so much fun."

"Have you nothing to do but make mischief?" Betsy scolded.

"Yes, indeed, young lady. This very minute I'm helping a ship get to port. It has a lot of soldiers on it. They're very eager to get back home. So I'm blowing west this evening instead of east. When I push, the ship's engines can go much faster."

"Maybe my brother Bill is on that ship!" cried Betsy.

"Maybe, maybe, maybe," echoed the wind. "But I must be on my way. I have to keep Jack Frost off the orchards Down South tonight. He can't nip the fruit while I keep him on the move. Goodbye, Betsy. Goodbye!"

Betsy switched on her light to fasten the shutters. Then she saw it. Brother Bill's letter lay right there at her feet.

"Mother. I have the letter!" she shouted, running downstairs. "It must have been hidden between the pages of my comic books all the time. Look, Mother, the wind found it for me!"

Mother didn't answer. She was speaking over the telephone. She was wiping tears out of her eyes and laughing, all at the same time.

"It's Brother Bill!" she exclaimed. "His ship has just come in. He'll be home tomorrow!"

"I knew he was coming," said Betsy. "The wind told me. And it found Bill's letter, too."

Mother patted Betsy's head. "You've been dreaming, dear. There's no wind now."

"It went Down South," Betsy might have added, "to chase Jack Frost."

But she didn't bother to explain. She was too sleepy. Besides, grown-ups don't take time to listen to what the wind has to say.
